Senior Lecturer - University of Strathclyde

Jennifer Remnant is a medical sociologist and disability studies scholar who focuses on the workplace as a site of inquiry. She is particularly interested in the social experiences of ill-health, and the interface of ill-health and employment. This can include researching interactions between healthcare workers and people experiencing ill-health, as well as the employment experiences of people managing ill-health – though these are not necessarily mutually exclusive.

She is a qualitative methodologist with specific expertise and experience in conducting sensitive data collection, participatory research and action research. Her research is politically informed by the social model of disability.
